Many businesses lack a tailored approach to managing their employment taxes – they generally follow established practices and routines. However, where the law is changed or circumstances alter slightly, this can significantly impact the employment taxes outcomes for businesses. Furthermore, errors in employment taxes are often perpetuated year on year, and so the impact can carry across a number of employment tax obligations.

There has been a rise in employment taxes compliance activity from government bodies – and there has been an increasing trend towards co-operation and information-sharing between the Australian Taxation Office, the State Revenue Offices and Workers' Compensation Authorities. As a result, businesses can experience increased scrutiny when it comes to employment taxes and related compliance activities.
